Scylax adds that it was the first city on the west promontory of Crete, and was a day s sail from Laceda3mon. It was natural that on my first visit to the city, its REMOVAL OF THE ANCIENT PORT. 231 artificial port having been thus referred to by so many authors, I should make special search to identify it; for although Pashley seemed to be satisfied that the mere indentation of the rocky coast-line under its walls was the said port, I could not be reconciled to that opinion. But I looked in vain for some mole in the sea in front of the indentation to render it somewhat sheltered and safe as an artificial emporium or trading-port; there was not even a sandy beach at any part of the rocky shore upon which a vessel could be safely landed, or...
