Excerpt: . . . is very far from being the case. Mr. Render seems inclined to close against us historys warning and instructive page: to this, however, we cannot agree, feeling the force of the adage, that history is philosophy teaching by example. We must, therefore, claim the liberty of asking, what corroboration it affords to the charge, which truth and Scripture alike force us to bring against that church, of being guilty of the blood of those saints whose bones lie scattered on many a mountain cold. To enter at any length on this painful topic would require far more space than we can afford, our references must be consequently brief. While admitting that persecution has raged, Mr. Render denies that it constitutes a principle of what he designates the Catholic--meaning, of course, the Papal--religion, requesting his readers to bear in mind that both Roman Catholics and...
