On Diurnal Influence. The same analogy exists in the alternating periods of increased and diminished excitement in a diurnal, as in a lunar, revolution. To exhibit this analogy more strikingly, I divide the day into thirty parts, consisting of 48 each, and these thirty parts I divide, as I have done the thirty days of the moon, into four periods, and each period into three parts. The first period of increased excitement begins at four o'clock in the morning, the first part of which consists of -, or twice 48 , or 1h 36 , or to 5h 36 o'clock, A. M.; the second part of, or 48 , or to 6 24 , A. M.; and the third part of 5, or four times 48 , or 3h 12 , which terminates this...
