Then cheer ye, gallant comrades, let these words your bosoms fill: Though Prussian be our uniform, our hearts are Saxon still! JS when in doubt a weary traveller stands Among the mountains that divide in twain The fields and rivers of two neighbouring lands, And gazes back upon the silent plain Which he hath crossed, and forward strains his eyes Into the hollow pass of frowning stone, Which hides the new land from his sight, and sighs, Not knowing if its beauties will atone For all his toil: so stand I now and muse, Sadly I muse upon the coming days, And on the unknown pathway I must choose, And on the varying breath of blame and praise; And doubt lies heavy on my heart, and fears Like clouds hang over the approaching years. H! do not frown, nor turn away with scorn From that fair valley which before us lies; The fields are laughing in the rosy morn, And all is fresh and fair to meet thine eyes. Is it not fair? Ah! do not turn away, Lest all its beauty fade and die for shame, And bud and blossom sink into the clay Without an epitaph, without a name. Thou wilt not: nay, the roses in thy cheek Betray the spirit which thine eyes would wrong; Look thou and listen while I strive to speak, And may such loveliness...
