Beneath the shade of thousand-acre groves of oaks, amongst cottonwood and willow and alder, the rank lush meadow grasses grew, a veritable paradise for the stockman; for here could be rested and fattened the northbound herds. And, as it was found that the rich river-bottom soil produced abundantly of the farmers staples, and that the production of wheat on the outlying plains was profitable, the settlement thrived and prospered. Thus, finding within itself provision for the peace and plenty of its limited population, and (until the first laying of the Southern Pacific tracks) cut off from the main line of travel and sequestered from the nervous stress of modern progress, Visalia was quietly content For many years the old ways and old methods seemed good to the settlers. Amid the groves the flocks and herds roamed and multiplied, and in the eastward...
